

Respect

Respect. Something that practically everyone wants to receive freely. Fewer people give freely. The ones most deserving are the ones that least demand or expect it.

It involves empathy, compassion, knowledge, introspection and is best when reciprocated.

Empathy, because one must be able to perceive and feel, or believe they have these capabilities, similar to the object.

Compassion, because lack of such would elevate the potential of conflict.

Knowledge, because absence of such, ignorance of the composition of the object and its potential, could result in a calculated experiences some of which would be detrimental.

Introspection, because the respecer needs to be very aware of their capabilities, weaknesses, and have clarity of the distinctions of their needs, desires and those of the respected.

Reciprocated, because it is a communication value – a two-way correlative criterion –critical to healthy cooperation in the process of accomplishing goals.

That which has the greater awareness of itself and its potential is usually the more humble in behavior and successful in the endeavors, period and conditions of existence.
